"My name is Just Glenn - I was charged with aggravated assault as a child, and lost 18 months of my life waiting for trial. I lived in a bad neighborhood and couldn't afford a lawyer. Eventually the DA dropped the charges - but I lost my high school graduation and was on my own for education.

Do you plan to use your position and power as District Attorney to end the use of cash bail and how will you ensure that significantly fewer people are detained in the city's pre-trial detention facilities without a massive expansion of electronic monitoring, which creates open-air prisons in our own homes and neighborhoods?

Terra Carr Deni: "Philadelphia has been ripping people off by the bail system for as long as I can remember. It started out with them taking 30% of whatever bail was deposited - so, not that long ago. In 2015, we had a man who was out on bail and it expired. He was in the back of his house when the police came and he was arrested for running off a parking ticket. The bail company assured him that it was taken care of and he was released. Now, I'm talking about 2015.

At the time, they were charging every inmate. So, Let's say you had a person that had a bail of $50,000. They would charge you $2,500, they would charge you another $2,500, all the way down to when you were out. They were charging the inmate, the bail bond company, and the family.

They're not going to let you out unless you post the full bail amount minus $250. They were not going to let you out unless you post the full bail amount minus $250. It's just a scam. They're livelihood is predicated on people not able to pay. The system is designed to fail.

I believe that anyone who is awaiting trial for a non-violent crime should have a path to release pre-trial. Detainers should only be used, as blanket rule, for individuals who have committed a class or a violent crime, or a serious violation. The system is designed to fail. That's how we're going to change it. We're going to change it in Philadelphia."

Criminal Justice Reform Committee. We came up with the situation of cash bail, no cash bail, and day reporting centers. That is not nothing new, but now it's new on the campaign trail.

"I believe that anyone who is awaiting trial for a non-violent crime should have a path to release pre-trial. Detainers should only be used, as blanket rule, for individuals who have committed a class or a violent crime, or a serious violation. The system is designed to fail. That's how we're going to change it. We're going to change it in Philadelphia."